reformation NK

Home | Classics | Contemporary | Reading | List | Bookstore | List of Uploads | Misc.

Christianity & Culture

y J. Gresham Machen (1881-1937)

rinceton Theological Review, Vol. 11, 1913. This essay was scanned and edited by Shane Rosenthal for Reformation Ink. It is now the public domain and may be freely copied and distributed. Original pagination has been kept intact for purposes of reference.

HE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 1

One of the greatest of the problems that have agitated the Church is the problem of the relation between nowledge and piety, between culture and Christianity. This problem has appeared first of all in the presence of wo tendencies in the Church—the scientific or academic tendency, and what may be called the practical tendency. ome men have devoted themselves chiefly to the task of forming right conceptions as to Christianity and its pundations. To them no fact, however trivial, has appeared worthy of neglect; by them truth has been cherished or its own sake, without immediate reference to practical consequences. Some, on the other hand, have mphasized the essential simplicity of the gospel. The world is lying in misery, we ourselves are sinners, men are erishing in sin every day. The gospel is the sole means of escape; let us preach it to the world while yet we may o desperate is the need that we have no time to engage in vain babblings or old wives' fables. While we are iscussing the exact location of the churches of Galatia, men are perishing under the curse of the law; while we re settling the date of Jesus' birth, the world is doing without its Christmas message.

he representatives of both of these tendencies regard themselves as Christians, but too often there is little rotherly feeling between them. The Christian of academic tastes accuses his brother of undue emotionalism, of nallow argumentation, of cheap methods of work. On the other hand, your practical man is ever loud in his enunciation

HE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 2

f academic indifference to the dire needs of humanity. The scholar is represented either as a dangerous isseminator of doubt, or else as a man whose faith is a faith without works. A man who investigates human sin nd the grace of God by the aid solely of dusty volumes, carefully secluded in a warm and comfortable study, rithout a thought of the men who are perishing in misery every day!

but if the problem appears thus in the presence of different tendencies in the Church, it becomes yet far more assistent within the consciousness of the individual. If we are thoughtful, we must see that the desire to know and ne desire to be saved are widely different. The scholar must apparently assume the attitude of an impartial bserver—an attitude which seems absolutely impossible to the pious Christian laying hold upon Jesus as the only aviour from the load of sin. If these two activities—on the one hand the acquisition of knowledge, and on the ther the exercise and inculcation of simple faith—are both to be given a place in our lives, the question of their roper relationship cannot be ignored.

The problem is made for us the more difficult of solution because we are unprepared for it. Our whole system of chool and college education is so constituted as to keep religion and culture as far apart as possible and ignore the uestion of the relationship between them. On five or six days in the week, we were engaged in the acquisition of nowledge. From this activity the study of religion was banished. We studied natural science without considering is bearing or lack of bearing upon natural theology or upon revelation. We studied Greek without opening the lew Testament. We studied history with careful avoidance of that greatest of historical movements which was shered in by the preaching of Jesus. In philosophy, the vital importance of the study for religion could not entirely e concealed, but it was kept as far as possible in the background. On Sundays, on the other hand, we had eligious instruction that called for little exercise of the intellect.

HE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 3

Careful preparation for Sunday-school lessons as for lessons in mathematics or Latin was unknown. Religion eemed to be something that had to do only with the emotions and the will, leaving the intellect to secular studies. What wonder that after such training we came to regard religion and culture as belonging to two entirely separate compartments of the soul, and their union as involving the destruction of both?

Jpon entering the Seminary, we are suddenly introduced to an entirely different procedure. Religion is suddenly emoved from its seclusion; the same methods of study are applied to it as were formerly reserved for natural cience and for history. We study the Bible no longer solely with the desire of moral and spiritual improvement, but also in order to know. Perhaps the first impression is one of infinite loss. The scientific spirit seems to be eplacing simple faith, the mere apprehension of dead facts to be replacing the practice of principles. The difficulty s perhaps not so much that we are brought face to face with new doubts as to the truth of Christianity. Rather is it he conflict of method, of spirit that troubles us. The scientific spirit seems to be incompatible with the old spirit of imple faith. In short, almost entirely unprepared, we are brought face to face with the problem of the relationship between knowledge and piety, or, otherwise expressed, between culture and Christianity.

This problem may be settled in one of three ways. In the first place, Christianity may be subordinated to culture. That solution really, though to some extent unconsciously, is being favored by a very large and influential portion of the Church today. For the elimination of the supernatural in Christianity—so tremendously common today—eally makes Christianity merely natural. Christianity becomes a human product, a mere part of human culture. But as such it is something entirely different from the old Christianity that was based upon a direct revelation from God. Deprived thus of its note of authority, the gospel is no gospel ny longer; it is a check for untold millions—but without the signature at the bottom. So in subordinating 'hristianity to culture we have really destroyed Christianity, and what continues to bear the old name is a ounterfeit.

- HE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 4

he second solution goes to the opposite extreme. In its effort to give religion a clear field, it seeks to destroy ulture. This solution is better than the first. Instead of indulging in a shallow optimism or deification of humanity, recognizes the profound evil of the world, and does not shrink from the most heroic remedy. The world is so evil nat it cannot possibly produce the means for its own salvation. Salvation must be the gift of an entirely new life, oming directly from God. Therefore, it is argued, the culture of this world must be a matter at least of indifference the Christian. Now in its extreme form this solution hardly requires refutation. If Christianity is really found to ontradict that reason which is our only means of apprehending truth, then of course we must either modify or bandon Christianity. We cannot therefore be entirely independent of the achievements of the intellect. urthermore, we cannot without inconsistency employ the printing-press, the railroad, the telegraph in the ropagation of our gospel, and at the same time denounce as evil those activities of the human mind that produced nese things. And in the production of these things not merely practical inventive genius had a part, but also, back f that, the investigations of pure science animated simply by the desire to know. In its extreme form, therefore, avolving the abandonment of all intellectual activity, this second solution would be adopted by none of us. But ery many pious men in the Church today are adopting this solution in essence and in spirit. They admit that the hristian must have a part in human culture. But they regard such activity as a necessary evil—a dangerous and nworthy task necessary to be gone through with under a stern sense of duty in order that thereby the higher ends f the gospel may be attained. Such men can never engage in the arts and ciences with anything like enthusiasm—such enthusiasm they would regard as disloyalty to the gospel. Such a osition is really both illogical and unbiblical. God has given us certain powers of mind, and has implanted within s the ineradicable conviction that these powers were intended to be exercised. The Bible, too, contains poetry nat exhibits no lack of enthusiasm, no lack of a keen appreciation of beauty. With this second solution of the roblem we cannot rest content. Despite all we can do, the desire to know and the love of beauty cannot be ntirely stifled, and we cannot permanently regard these desires as evil.

HE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 5

ontending forces? A third solution, fortunately, is possible—namely consecration. Instead of destroying the arts nd sciences or being indifferent to them, let us cultivate them with all the enthusiasm of the veriest humanist, but the same time consecrate them to the service of our God. Instead of stifling the pleasures afforded by the equisition of knowledge or by the appreciation of what is beautiful, let us accept these pleasures as the gifts of a eavenly Father. Instead of obliterating the distinction between the Kingdom and the world, or on the other hand withdrawing from the world into a sort of modernized intellectual monasticism, let us go forth joyfully, nthusiastically to make the world subject to God.

Certain obvious advantages are connected with such a solution of the problem. In the first place, a logical dvantage. A man can believe only what he holds to be true. We are Christians because we hold Christianity to be

ue. But other men hold Christianity to be false. Who is right? That question can be settled only by an camination and comparison of the reasons adduced on both sides. It is true, one of the grounds for our belief is an award experience that we cannot share—the great experience begun by conviction of sin and conversion and ontinued by communion with God—an experience which other men do not ossess, and upon which, therefore, we cannot directly base an argument. But if our position is correct, we ought t least to be able to show the other man that his reasons may be inconclusive. And that involves careful study of oth sides of the question. Furthermore, the field of Christianity is the world. The Christian cannot be satisfied so ong as any human activity is either opposed to Christianity or out of all connection with Christianity. Christianity nust pervade not merely all nations, but also all of human thought. The Christian, therefore, cannot be indifferent any branch of earnest human endeavor. It must all be brought into some relation to the gospel. It must be studied ither in order to be demonstrated as false, or else in order to be made useful in advancing the Kingdom of God. he Kingdom must be advanced not merely extensively, but also intensively. The Church must seek to conquer ot merely every man for Christ, but also the whole of man. We are accustomed to encourage ourselves in our iscouragements by the thought of the time when every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that Jesus is ord. No less inspiring is the other aspect of that same great consummation. That will also be a time when doubts ave disappeared, when every contradiction has been removed, when all of science converges to one great onviction, when all of art is devoted to one great end, when all of human thinking is permeated by the refining, nnobling influence of Jesus, when every thought has been brought into subjection to the obedience of Christ.

HE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 6

f to some of our practical men, these advantages of our solution of the problem seem to be intangible, we can oint to the merely numerical advantage of intellectual and artistic activity within the Church. We are all agreed nat at least one great function of the Church is the conversion of individual men. The missionary movement is the reat religious movement of our day. Now it is perfectly true that men must be brought to Christ one by one. There are no labor-saving devices in evangelism. It is all hand-work.

HE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 7

and yet it would be a great mistake to suppose that all men are equally well prepared to receive the gospel. It is rue that the decisive thing is the regenerative power of God. That can overcome all lack of preparation, and the ibsence of that makes even the best preparation useless. But as a matter of fact God usually exerts that power in connection with certain prior conditions of the human mind, and it should be ours to create, so far as we can, with he help of God, those favorable conditions for the reception of the gospel. False ideas are the greatest obstacles to he reception of the gospel. We may preach with all the fervor of a reformer and yet succeed only in winning a traggler here and there, if we permit the whole collective thought of the nation or of the world to be controlled by deas which, by the resistless force of logic, prevent Christianity from being regarded as anything more than a tarmless delusion. Under such circumstances, what God desires us to do is to destroy the obstacle at its root. Many would have the seminaries combat error by attacking it as it is taught by its popular exponents. Instead of that they confuse their students with a lot of German names unknown outside the walls of the universities. That method of procedure is based simply upon a profound belief in the pervasiveness of ideas. What is today matter of academic speculation begins tomorrow to move armies and pull down empires. In that second stage, it has gone too far to be ombatted; the time to stop it was when it was still a matter of impassionate debate. So as Christians we should try mold the thought of the world in such a way as to make the acceptance of Christianity something more than a gical absurdity. Thoughtful men are wondering why the students of our great Eastern universities no longer need the ministry or display any very vital interest in Christianity. Various totally inadequate explanations are coposed, such as the increasing attractiveness of other professions—an absurd explanation, by the way, since ther professions are becoming so over-crowded that a man can arely make a living in them. The real difficulty amounts to this—that the thought of the day, as it makes itself nost strongly felt in the universities, but from them spreads inevitably to the masses of the people, is profoundly pposed to Christianity, or at least—what is nearly as bad—it is out of all connection with Christianity. The hurch is unable either to combat it or to assimilate it, because the Church simply does not understand it. Under uch circumstances, what more pressing duty than for those who have received the mighty experience of ageneration, who, therefore, do not, like the world, neglect that whole series of vitally relevant facts which is mbraced in Christian experience—what more pressing duty than for these men to make themselves masters of the nought of the world in order to make it an instrument of truth instead of error? The Church has no right to be so bsorbed in helping the individual that she forgets the world.

HE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 8

here are two objections to our solution of the problem. If you bring culture and Christianity thus into close nion—in the first place, will not Christianity destroy culture? Must not art and science be independent in order to ourish? We answer that it all depends upon the nature of their dependence. Subjection to any external authority reven to any human authority would be fatal to art and science. But subjection to God is entirely different. Dedication of human powers to God is found, as a matter of fact, not to destroy but to heighten them. God gave nose powers. He understands them well enough not bunglingly to destroy His own gifts. In the second place, will ot culture destroy Christianity? Is it not far easier to be an earnest Christian if you confine your attention to the lible and do not risk being led astray by the thought of the world? We answer, of course it is easier. Shut yourself p in an intellectual monastery, do not disturb yourself with the thoughts of unregenerate men, and of course you will find it easier to be a Christian, just as it is easier to be a good soldier in comfortable winter quarters than it is on ne field of battle. You ave your own soul—but the Lord's enemies remain in possession of the field.

HE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 9

But by whom is this task of transforming the unwieldy, resisting mass of human thought until it becomes ubservient to the gospel—by whom is this task to be accomplished? To some extent, no doubt, by professors in heological seminaries and universities. But the ordinary minister of the gospel cannot shirk his responsibility. It is great mistake to suppose that investigation can successfully be carried on by a few specialists whose work is of nterest to nobody but themselves. Many men of many minds are needed. What we need first of all, especially in our American churches, is a more general interest in the problems of theological science. Without that, the pecialist is without the stimulating atmosphere which nerves him to do his work.

ut no matter what his station in life, the scholar must be a regenerated man—he must yield to no one in the tensity and depth of his religious experience. We are well supplied in the world with excellent scholars who are ithout that qualification. They are doing useful work in detail, in Biblical philology, in exegesis, in Biblical eology, and in other branches of study. But they are not accomplishing the great task, they are not assimilating odern thought to Christianity, because they are without that experience of God's power in the soul which is of e essence of Christianity. They have only one side for the comparison. Modern thought they know, but hristianity is really foreign to them. It is just that great inward experience which it is the function of the true hristian scholar to bring into some sort of connection with the thought of the world.

ruring the last thirty years there has been a tremendous defection from the Christian Church. It is evidenced even y things that lie on the surface. For example, by the decline in church attendance and in Sabbath observance and the number of candidates for the ministry. Special xplanations, it is true, are sometimes given for these discouraging tendencies. But why should we deceive urselves, why comfort ourselves by palliative explanations? Let us face the facts. The falling off in church tendance, the neglect of Sabbath observance—these things are simply surface indications of a decline in the ower of Christianity. Christianity is exerting a far less powerful direct influence in the civilized world today than was exerting thirty years ago.

HE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 10

What is the cause of this tremendous defection? For my part, I have little hesitation in saying that it lies chiefly in ne intellectual sphere. Men do not accept Christianity because they can no longer be convinced that Christianity is ue. It may be useful, but is it true? Other explanations, of course, are given. The modern defection from the hurch is explained by the practical materialism of the age. Men are so much engrossed in making money that ney have no time for spiritual things. That explanation has a certain range of validity. But its range is limited. It pplies perhaps to the boom towns of the West, where men are intoxicated by sudden possibilities of boundless realth. But the defection from Christianity is far broader than that. It is felt in the settled countries of Europe even nore strongly than in America. It is felt among the poor just as strongly as among the rich. Finally it is felt most trongly of all in the universities, and that is only one indication more that the true cause of the defection is ntellectual. To a very large extent, the students of our great Eastern universities—and still more the universities of turope—are not Christians. And they are not Christians often just because they are students. The thought of the day, as it makes itself most strongly felt in the universities, is profoundly opposed to Christianity, or at least it is out f connection with Christianity. The chief obstacle to the Christian religion today lies in the sphere of the intellect.

hat assertion must be guarded against two misconceptions.

THE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 11

n the first place, I do not mean that most men reject Christianity consciously on account of intellectual difficulties. In the contrary, rejection of Christianity is due in the vast majority of cases simply to indifference. Only a few nen have given the subject real attention. The vast majority of those who reject the gospel do so simply because hey know nothing about it. But whence comes this indifference? It is due to the intellectual atmosphere in which en are living. The modern world is dominated by ideas which ignore the gospel. Modern culture is not altogether posed to the gospel. But it is out of all connection with it. It not only prevents the acceptance of Christianity. It events Christianity even from getting a hearing.

the second place, I do not mean that the removal of intellectual objections will make a man a Christian. No inversion was ever wrought simply by argument. A change of heart is also necessary. And that can be wrought ally by the immediate exercise of the power of God. But because intellectual labor is insufficient it does not allow, as is so often assumed, that it is unnecessary. God may, it is true, overcome all intellectual obstacles by an immediate exercise of His regenerative power. Sometimes He does, But He does so very seldom. Usually He terts His power in connection with certain conditions of the human mind. Usually He does not bring into the ingdom, entirely without preparation, those whose mind and fancy are completely dominated by ideas which ake the acceptance of the gospel logically impossible.

lodern culture is a tremendous force. It affects all classes of society. It affects the ignorant as well as the learned. That is to be done about it? In the first place the Church may simply withdraw from the conflict. She may simply allow the mighty stream of modern thought to flow by unheeded and do her work merely in the back-eddies of the current. There are still some men in the world who have been unaffected by modern culture. They may still > won for Christ without intellectual labor. And they must be won. It is useful, it is necessary work. If the hurch is satisfied with that alone, let her give up the scientific education of her ministry. Let her assume the truth f her message and learn simply how it may be applied in detail to modern industrial and social conditions. Let her ive up the laborious study of Greek and Hebrew. Let her abandon the scientific study of history to the men of the orld. In a day of increased scientific interest, let the Church go on becoming less scientific. In a day of increased pecialization, of renewed interest in philology and in history, of more rigorous scientific method, let the Church on abandoning her Bible to her enemies. They will study it scientifically, rest assured, if the Church does not. et her substitute sociology altogether for Hebrew, practical expertness for the proof of her gospel. Let her shorten ie preparation of her ministry, let her permit it to be interrupted yet more and more by premature practical activity. y doing so she will win a straggler here and there. But her winnings will be but temporary. The great current of iodern culture will sooner or later engulf her puny eddy. God will save her somehow—out of the depths. But the abor of centuries will have been swept away. God grant that the Church may not resign herself to that. God grant ne may face her problem squarely and bravely. That problem is not easy. It involves the very basis of her faith. hristianity is the proclamation of an historical fact—that Jesus Christ rose from the dead. Modern thought has no place for that proclamation. It prevents men even from listening to the message. Yet the culture of today cannot mply be rejected as a whole. It is not like the pagan culture of the first century. It is not wholly non-Christian. luch of it has been derived directly from the Bible. There are significant movements in it, going to waste, which right well be used for the defence of the gospel. The situation is complex. Easy wholesale measures are not in lace. Discrimination, investigation is necessary. Some

HE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 12

HE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 13

f modern thought must be refuted. The rest must be made subservient. But nothing in it can be ignored. He that is ot with us is against us. Modern culture is a mighty force. It is either subservient to the gospel or else it is the eadliest enemy of the gospel. For making it subservient, religious emotion is not enough, intellectual labor is also ecessary. And that labor is being neglected. The Church has turned to easier tasks. And now she is reaping the uits of her indolence. Now she must battle for her life.

he situation is desperate. It might discourage us. But not if we are truly Christians. Not if we are living in vital ommunion with the risen Lord. If we are really convinced of the truth of our message, then we can proclaim it efore a world of enemies, then the very difficulty of our task, the very scarcity of our allies becomes an ispiration, then we can even rejoice that God did not place us in an easy age, but in a time of doubt and explexity and battle. Then, too, we shall not be afraid to call forth other soldiers into the conflict. Instead of taking our theological seminaries merely centres of religious emotion, we shall make them battle-grounds of the iith, where, helped a little by the experience of Christian teachers, men are taught to fight their own battle, where they come to appreciate the real strength of the adversary and in the hard school of intellectual struggle learn to abstitute for the unthinking faith of childhood the profound convictions of full-grown men. Let us not fear in this loss of spiritual power. The Church is perishing today through the lack of thinking, not through an excess of it, he is winning victories in the sphere of material betterment. Such victories are glorious. God save us from the eartless crime of disparaging them. They are relieving the misery of men. But if they stand alone, I fear they are ut temporary. The things which are seen are temporal; the things which are not seen are eternal. What will ecome of philanthropy if God be lost? Beneath the surface of life lies a

HE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 14

orld of spirit. Philosophers have attempted to explore it. Christianity has revealed its wonders to the simple soul. here lie the springs of the Church's power. But that spiritual realm cannot be entered without controversy. And how the Church is shrinking from the conflict. Driven from the spiritual realm by the current of modern thought, ne is consoling herself with things about which there is no dispute. If she favors better housing for the poor, she eed fear no contradiction. She will need all her courage. she will have enemies enough, God knows. But they rill not fight her with argument. The twentieth century, in theory, is agreed on social betterment. But sin, and eath, and salvation, and life, and God-about these things there is debate. You can avoid the debate if you noose. You need only drift with the current. Preach every Sunday during your Seminary course, devote the fag nds of your time to study and to thought, study about as you studied in college—and these questions will robably never trouble you. The great questions may easily be avoided. Many preachers are avoiding them. And lany preachers are preaching to the air. The Church is waiting for men of another type. Men to fight her battles nd solve her problems. The hope of finding them is the one great inspiration of a Seminary's life. They need not I be men of conspicuous attainments. But they must all be men of thought. They must fight hard against spiritual nd intellectual indolence. Their thinking may be confined to narrow limits. But it must be their own. To them leology must be something more than a task. It must be a matter of inquiry. It must lead not to successful remorizing, but to genuine convictions.

he Church is puzzled by the world's indifference. She is trying to overcome it by adapting her message to the ishions of the day. But if, instead, before the conflict, she would descend into the secret place of meditation, if by ie clear light of the gospel she would seek an answer not merely to the questions of the hour but, first of all, the eternal problems of the spiritual world, then perhaps, by God's grace, through His good Spirit, in His good ne, she might issue forth once more with power, and an age of doubt might be followed by the dawn of an era of ith.

HE PRINCETON THEOLOGICAL REVIEW, Vol. 11, 1913, Page 15

Princeton.

J. Gresham Machen

his article was made available on the internet via REFORMATION INK (www.markers.com/ink). Refer any correspondence to nane Rosenthal: ReformationInk at mac.com (connect and write as @mac.com -- when I connect them I get a lot of junk mail). ÿÿÿ